LITERATURE OF THE DAY

CELEBRATING A BIRTH IN GRADE.

Squawson spring from a family of no small name and held in no respect, began a 1712 the career which he ended as Generalissimo of the Russian forces as a private soldier in the Russian Guards of the Emperor Elizabeth. He won every step in his rapid promotion by his prowess and daring on the field of battle. In five years he attained to the rank of Colonel; in 1740 he received further promotion, and in 1754 he quitted the Guards with a Lieutenant's commission. His first campaign, was made in the course of the Seven Years' War with Prussia, when Frederick the Great was "like to be overwhelmed" by his enemies and he was present at the capture of Berlin by Tottleben in 1760. For his valor in this war Catherine promoted him, in 1762, with a Colonel's commission written by her own hand. As a Brigadier General, he marched against the confederates in Poland in 1768, obtaining the full rank of Major-General two years later. When finally he was made Marshal of the Empire, he performed in the presence of the army some of the most wonderful feats recorded in the chronicles of the great. The allegorical buffooneries, Squawson performed on the occasion of his elevation to the Marshalsate were of the most grotesque character. Of the half-an-perpetual, half-religious temper of the Russian boor, he saw the hand of Providence in his success in life. He resolved that he should publicly thank the Duty for it, which he did in the cathedral church of Warsaw. He packed the cathedral with soldiers to witness the following religious-comic entertainment. Having placed in a line as many chairs as there were officers senior to himself and holding military rank between that he had been promoted from, and that he had been promoted to, he entered the building in his shirt-sleeves, and in the leap-frog style vaulted over each chair, thereby typifying how he had vaulted over his rivals. Thereafter, in the presence of the grinning yet admiring soldiery, who loved yet laughed at their erratic, brilliant and vain-glorious chief, he dressed himself in his Marshal's uniform, covering his breast with his numerous decorations and orders and trinkets. He danced and skipped like a lumbic, and posed and pruned in his new costume. Before entering himself, he laughed and kissed it, and made again and again the sign of the cross; and the mild, innocent vanity of the man showed itself not only in the way he strutted about, inflated with a sense of his self-importance, but in the remarks he made on little Nicholas Solikoff, who thought himself specially slighted by Squawson's promotion over his head. "I don't wonder that they did not give such a dress as this to little Nick; it would be too heavy for him." Temple Bar.
